Trico Spinner - Olive:

Tied with Organza fibers to give the wings that extra shimmer on the water similar to the natural. Tied in dark olive to match the diversity seen on some rivers, such as California's Hat Creek. The Trico spinner fall can be an amazing, and often frustrating hatch. The little Tricorythodes Mayfly spends its time in slow water on many rivers throughout the United States. Their hatch is very predictable and often in great numbers, and trout key in on this pattern. The spinner fall follows the hatch closely, and often both Duns and Spinners are on the water at the same time. The challenge is getting the trout to choose your imitation over the hundreds of naturals passing by. This hatch usually requires patience, precision casting and tiny leaders. Usually you'll have plenty of dimples on the water to target during a good hatch. The fish will swim together and feed in pods. It is very rewarding when you put things together and hook a fish!
